Vaccination Workplaces

Advisory

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) on Friday issued updated guidance saying companies can legally require their employees to get a Covid-19 vaccine—but some workers, including some at one hospital, are fighting back against vaccine mandates.

In the guidance, EEOC said companies can require employees to receive Covid-19 vaccines, although they must also provide reasonable accommodations to those exempt from mandatory vaccines under the Americans with Disabilities Act and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

Further, if employers offer on-site vaccinations, they must keep all personal medical records obtained confidential, the guidance said. EEOC also said employers can offer incentives for their employees to get vaccinated, but the incentives cannot be "coercive."

Marketwatch

Here's a riddle for a pandemic age: When is a doughnut a carrot?

Answer: When the deep-fried treat is dangled as an enticement to get the COVID-19 vaccine.

Government officials, companies and employers keep trying to persuade vaccine hold-outs to get the shot. They are turning to all kinds of proverbial carrots — including free doughnuts, cash, paid time off and free rides — to incentivize vaccination.

Now, federal workplace regulators are weighing in on how far employer-run incentives can go. Closely-watched guidance from the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) last week offers some answers for the unprecedented questions on how mass vaccination efforts during a pandemic mesh with workplace protections rules.
